Both Vietnam and Malaysia have introduced import restrictions in response to the increased volumes of waste entering the countries in the months since China's ban on 24 grades of solid waste – casting further doubt on the ability of other South-East Asian economies to absorb China's lost capacity.

Last week, Vietnamese Prime Minister Nguyen Xuan Phuc announced that the country would not be issuing any new import licenses. Vietnam is set to follow up its new restrictions with a crackdown on smuggled waste as more than 6,000 containers of paper, plastic and metal scrap remain in limbo at Vietnamese customs points awaiting processing, according to reporting by Reuters.

Meanwhile, Malaysian Minister of Housing and Local Government Zuraida Kamaruddin said that Malaysia has revoked licences for 114 factories around the country, although state news agency Bernama has reported that facilities with approved permits may continue to import material and those which have seen their permits revoked should re-apply within three months.

The import restrictions imposed by the two countries are not entirely unpredictable given the flood of waste into these countries following China's own restrictions, which have sent the recycling world into a headspin.

China announced at the start of the year that it would be banning imports of certain types of solid waste, including post-consumer plastics and mixed papers. This provoked panic in the UK recycling industry given that the UK – up until the start of the year – relied on China as an outlet for waste that could not be recycled domestically, sending around 494,000 tonnes of plastics and 1.4 million tonnes of recovered paper to China every year.

China's Waste Ban Is Causing A Trash Crisis In The U.S. (HBO)

VICE News Tonight | HBO

An aerial photograph of a large port facility. In the foreground, a massive CMA CGM container ship is docked at a pier, its hull and containers clearly visible. The pier is crowded with hundreds of colorful shipping containers stacked in neat rows. Several large blue gantry cranes are positioned along the dock, some with their arms extended over the ship. In the background, other ships are visible in the water, and the horizon is hazy. The overall scene depicts a busy international shipping hub.
